Reading

Breaking Fast

Amir: Ramadan is a month-long holiday for Muslims all around the world. We fast from sunrise to sunset and focus on being thankful, helping others, and getting closer to Allah.

Henry: Hey Amir, what's up?

Amir: Not much, just getting ready for Ramadan.

Henry: Ramadan? What's that?

Henry: Wow, that sounds like a lot of work.

Amir: It can be, but it's also really rewarding. Plus, we always have a big celebration with family and friends.

Henry: What do you eat during the breaking of the fast?

Amir: We usually break our fast with dates and water, just like the Prophet Muhammad did. Then, we have a big meal with all kinds of delicious food.

Henry: That sounds amazing! Can I join in on the celebration?

Amir: Of course! I would love for you to join me and my family. It's a great opportunity to learn about a different culture and try new things.

Henry: Cool, I'm in! What can I do to help with the preparation?

Amir: Well, you could help set the table, or even cook some food. It's all about coming together and sharing the love.

Henry: Sounds great. I can't wait to experience Ramadan with you and your family.

Amir: Me too. It's going to be a great time.

Why do you think Amir invited Henry to join him in celebrating Ramadan? What does this tell us about the holiday and its cultural significance?

How do you think the celebration after Ramadan affects the daily lives of those who observe it?

What can you infer about Ramadan based on the dialogue between Henry and Amir?
